23. What other types of cheating or dishonesty have you witnessed or participated in during high school that has not been asked about in this survey? Please enter "none" or "not applicable" if there are none.

Response
Teachers helping students on tests/ quizzes
None
I've seen people of different class times share the specific questions on the test.
I have witnessed people use their cell phones and other technological devices. I have also seen students make cheat sheets and write answers on the desk and/or a small piece of paper.
I have witnessed kids taking binders and notes from kids from older grades; and thus knowing exactly what will be on the exam.
The type of cheating that is accounted for mostly in my school setting is on homework's. Most students will help each other on homework's or copy each other answers. Except for this most cheating is to the minimum. We have found different online recourses to help identify cheating on tests and papers in order to stop cheating.
On a quiz I saw a student write answers to some questions on his desk before the quiz started and then proceeded to use the information on the quiz.

Response
Kids cheating on a math test together and then they both ended up getting in trouble
Many students in my school ask to go the bathroom so they can use their vape devices. I've never taken part but know it occurs, and many of those students have been caught.
People using their cell phones during tests to look up the answers.
I've known of students who have managed to cheat on the SAT by having an inside source to give them knowledge of the test prior to taking it.
Use of the internet during a test. Asking others for test answers. Discussing a test before everyone has taken it.
All types have been covered in this survey!
People doing assignments for other people and the person taking credit. Taking picture of tests and send them to later periods Looking test up online Stealing test from teacher
As a student who has taken several Foreign Languages, very often I notice students who don't really care about the language they take using Google Translate on everything, from the most mundane busywork to tests. Seeing as I try to be as academically honest as I can, this has always irked me.
I witnessed sharing on answers on a English independent assignment while the teacher was away on the British Exchange. It was a two week workload that many felt was unreasonable so to lighten the burden they divvied up the assignments and shared their parts to each other.
Another form of dishonesty I have witnessed during high school is ditching classes because a student did not like the class or the teacher.
My school mainly consisted of students cheating on smaller assignments, particularly homework.
When turning in assignments for my school we are expected to take note of anyone who assisted in some way with an assignment. Many times intellectual plagiarism is overlooked because there is no exact way to know if a student's ideas are there own and as students most ideas aren't our own. But if the entire idea of an assignment is taken from someone else you shouldn't call it your own honest work.
Some people would steal the information without the person who did the work knowing, other times both parties were guilty. Also I think there is a difference in working together on a homework assignment when it is really difficult, when people are lazy, doing on a regular planned basis, and doing so on a paper or take home test. There are degrees of dishonesty in each of these situations and sometime mitigating circumstances so it is very hard do judge just based on the information provided.

	During high school I have occasionally signed in a friend as "on time" to avoid them getting a lateness. I have witnessed copying and cheating on tests and homework assignments and have once copied a homework assignment
	One student missing an exam and then other students giving that student questions on the exam.
	Lying to get out of dress code. (Witnessed)
	I have witnessed people using their phones during an exam, as well as students finding tests online and taking pictures of the answer sheet for the test.
	The most common type of cheating during high school was on homework assignments.
	I have witnessed almost everything in the cheating realm because of the fact that the high school I currently attend is extremely competitive and students are always trying to one up the other. This is done by getting as much information as possible on assignments that might sometimes either be from a bad source or just answers on a test. I do not participate in this behavior because of the fact if caught one could be expelled. There are even instances that I have heard directly, which includes a student pulling fire alarm because they were not prepared for a exam and another student using his cell phone during an exam to look up answers.
	Witnessed opening other tabs during online exams.
	Sometimes teachers for certain subjects like math or science will post the answer sheets online for an assignment before it is due, so people will just copy the answers from the answer sheet.
	I served on the student-run Honor Council, where most of the cases we had centered around students lying to create the impression they had more work done than they really did.
	Use of a technological device on a test/final exam.
	Use of cellphone for aid on a final examination/midterm.
	I don't know if this constitutes academic dishonesty, but there were a number of students in my honors-level English classes who would not complete assigned reading material, even the novels that they were writing term papers on. However, the students were usually pretty upfront about this fact, so it might be considered more of an annoyance than a serious infraction. In general, though, I ran with a pretty honest crowd, so that was about the worst I had seen.
	Using the internet to obtain answers on homework, or with a mobile device for in-class assignments.

Response
cheating on study guides, but that may not be as applicable in college
There were times where people copied notes and such without permission but the notes were later given to us.
Grading own tests and changing answers to be correct.
Witnessed: the use of technology when prompted not to do so (calculator or phone)
None, I come from a very small town. The crowd I associate myself with is generally very honest when it comes to our schoolwork.
When someone is taking a test late I sometime see them cheating because they are taking the test in a different room.
Mainly, the "cheating" I saw was collaboration for useless class assignments meant to be busywork. There have been instances of attempted cheating on quizzes, but everyone would quiet down after someone warned them.
Many students at my school use their phones during tests and even final exams and the teachers either don't notice or don't care enough to call them out.
Copying homework assignments
People sometime do not do their own work.
I have witnessed students lying to leave class early
I once noticed students writing notes and answers on their desks before taking a test or quiz.
Use of Smart Watches and Cell Phones during tests by other students I have seen other students hand in previous homework instead of the current homework
For IB Examinations, past papers and/or specimen papers are available on many third-party website. For Mock/Trial exams, students who were told not to use these resources - which are often times reused or identical to exams being tested - used them regardless. In short, using papers that you know a teacher will use to test you.
I have witnessed cell-phone use during a test.
Most of the cheating I have witnessed has mostly been on homework. Our honor code is very strict on tests, but not followed very religiously with homework. Many studentns will forget to do the homework, so they'll copy another students, which in turn is cheating.
I have witnessed the transfer of homework assignments from one student to others in the form of text messages. Also I have participated in the sharing of google docs among students, but typically for group studying purposes as opposed to cheating or dishonesty. This, however, has resulted in unfair distribution of workload.

	Finding the final online and sharing the link with others.
	I have witnessed cell phone use during tests and the use of mechanical pencils to hide formulae.
	Finding answer sheets online for various assignments.
	I have witnessed someone cheating on an AP examination as well as the SATs.
	Cheating on online quizzes or students talking about a test from one period to students of another period who have not yet taken the test
	Copying a whole years worth of work
	I myself have never been dishonest in a situation that would harm others, or prove to be unfair. I have witnessed many many other accounts of dishonesty within high school... i.e. a teacher's dishonesty about a student's situation, about a student's grade, or about a conversation that was had. Also during high school, I have witnessed heating among almost every couple that exists within our school, not that that pertains to education, but it provides a steady platform for lying and cheating to continue on within other aspects of their life.
	In one of the classes offered at my school, there is a very important research paper that counts for a large amount of ones quarter grade. One of the students in the class asked another student to send their paper to them so they could "read over it and compare it to theirs". This student lied and ended up completely copying the essay and turning it in before the person he took it from was able to. This meant that the second person was accused of plagiarizing a paper when in fact their paper was the one that was plagiarized.
	Finding answers online in a context where research isn't involved in the work.
	I've seen people not fully do their homework assignments or similar work and still get credit for it, and although I can say I've never been involved in serious cheating I believe it still occurs for some other students.
	Since we are a boarding school, our honor code extends into every aspect of our lives. Our Honor Code includes lying and stealing as well as failing to discourage others from violating the code.
	At my high school I did not begin witnessing notable plagiarism and other forms of cheating until my senior year. My school relies heavily on iPads to help facilitate students' academic environment. What many students began to do, because of the so-called "senioritis" (general

	Response
	laziness), was to share assignment answers. What many students do is take screenshots of their assignments and send them to their friend(s), often in exchange for another assignments. Recently, in early May, I was included in a group iMessage that was first created so that I and a few friends could work on our group project outside of school. This group chat quickly fell into a miniature sanctuary for test and quiz answers in history.
	Having been a member of multiple honors societies, many kids would not complete the allotted amount of volunteer hours needed for the society to get cords so they would fabricate events during which they supposedly "volunteered"
	I was a member of my school's disciplinary committee, so I was exposed to many cases of plagiarism, cheating, and general deceit. I find it important to remember that there is always context behind every disciplinary case, and most cases are not black and white.
	During my senior year I witnessed mass cheating on english vocabulary tests, to the point where the teacher would just turn a blind eye to get that part of the class over with.
	taking extra time or using the internet for take home assessments
	During my time in high school, the most common type of cheating I witnessed was students leaving study guides in places they could still be still seen during examinations. The action was rarely talked about but often drew criticism from those who took the test fairly. It aggravated me that the students who took the test dishonestly could potentially do better than myself, one who took the test fairly. However, I never told school authority because I felt it was not my business.
	I have seen a lot of cheating with the use of technology.
	The other types of cheating I have witnessed during high school included cheating while being in a relationship. There have been countless people in relationships who have cheated on their boyfriend/girlfriend.
	The other type of cheating I have witnessed during high school was cheating in relationships. There have been countless times where people have cheated on their girlfriend/boyfriend in high school.
	finding answers to assignments online and copying
	The use of technological aids by other students when they are not permitted to do so
	A senior forcing freshmen to do all of the work in a group project.
	I have witnessed people cheating on take home exams, especially if it is for a math course and you were not allowed to use a calculator.

	Response
	none. I'm very sorry on the previous answer I misread the answers and my opinion on 9-22 should all be "very dishonest." I just finished a new one. Sorry for the inconvenience.
	Not Applicable
	- the use of computers during a test to look up answers
	-people used computers to look up answers on a test
	In the realm of sports, some athletes at my school cheat or use foul play to improve the results of their game score.
	Hearing people talking about it but not actually seeing them do it.
	I have seen students who have taken an exam give tips and hints to students who have not yet taken the exam. For example, once a student lender another student (who had yet to take the test) their corrected copy of the test.
	All of the types of cheating and dishonesty have been mentioned.
	using electronics in class to research questions when not asked to- a form of cheating asking or telling other students test materials lying about turning in a paper/ project
	I have witnessed people asking a member of an earlier class in the day what is on that particular classes test.
	I do not think I have ever see anyone cheated in my high school year.
	none, but I think for the ones I said "not dishonest" to, they are slightly but they also can be understandable in certain situations.
	In the beginning of freshman year, I was allowed to use my translator as a foreign student during the test for understanding the questions. I have used the translator to gain advantage such as answering vocabulary questions.
